Day 5

Now that you’ve practiced spending the day asking questions, you’re going to work on embracing question-asking with your life. Grab a journal or a few sheets of paper, and make these headings:

Questions about God
Questions about life
Questions about my future
Questions about schoolwork
Questions about my passions/interests

Any time that you’re tempted to quit something because you don’t understand, come back to your journal and write your question down. Then dig deeper and see if you can find the answer. If you can, come back and write down the answer. If you can’t, keep going anyway, and come back and write down how your determination to keep going even when you didn’t have all the answers paid off.

Make “asking questions but going ahead anyway without all the answers” a practice in your life, and one day you’ll look up and see you finished what you started and learned a whole lot along the way!
Did you know that God is okay with your questions? In fact, He welcomes them! Why? Because asking questions is a great way to get to know someone, and when we ask God questions about His character, His love, His plan for our lives, we are opening the door to get to know Him better! Fill in the blanks of the prayer below, and then use your answers in a prayer to God.

One thing I love about God: _______________________________________

One thing I don’t understand about God: _______________________________________

One thing I wish I knew about God: _______________________________________

One thing I wish I knew about God’s plan for me: _______________________________________

One thing I know about God that helps me know I can trust Him: _______________________________________

End your prayer by thanking God for welcoming your questions and wanting to have a deeper relationship with you!

Day 2

Read Acts 8:26-40

As you read Acts 8:26-40, underline all of the questions the Ethiopian man has.

Notice even his last question:

What can stop me from being baptized?

This isn’t really even a question—it’s more of what we might call a rhetorical question, a question for effect rather than a question that really needs answering.

Asking questions is not a bad thing—in fact, it’s a good thing! When we stop asking questions, we often stop learning. And learning about God and His Story is always a great thing!

Day 3

Day 4

Today, you might annoy people around you a little. But that’s okay. Because for one day, you’re going to aim to ask as many questions as you can. Don’t ask annoying ones (like the constant “why?”), or things that you already know the answer to, but anytime you come across anything you don’t understand, ask. Intentionally look for things around you that don’t make sense, or that you don’t know how they work, and ask someone who knows.

At the end of the day, share all the information you learned with a parent. Talk about how you looked at things differently when you were truly trying to understand. Did you ever want to give up on something because you didn’t understand it? How did it feel to keep going anyway?
